running. Clinically diagnostic ability of dynamic MR cholangiopancreatography for choledocholithiasis. The aims of this study were to evaluate the ability of contrast-enhanced dynamic magnetic resonance cholangiopancreatography (MRCP) to diagnose choledocholithiasis and to elucidate factors influencing its diagnostic ability. The clinical presentation of choledocholithiasis was retrospectively reviewed for 96 patients who underwent dynamic MRCP for choledocholithiasis. The sensitivity and specificity of MRCP for choledocholithiasis were determined by correlating MRCP findings with intraoperative or endoscopic stone removal.

Fourteen of 65 patients with clinical evidence of choledocholithiasis had MRCP findings showing slight common bile duct dilatation without choledocholithiasis. Twenty-two of 26 patients with normal clinical presentation were diagnosed with choledocholithiasis by MRCP, resulting in an overall sensitivity of 75% (95% confidence interval [CI], 62-86%). The overall specificity of MRCP for choledocholithiasis was 100% (95% CI, 98-100%). The diagnostic ability of MRCP (sensitivity + specificity - 1) was 78.6% (95% CI, 67-88.4%). False-negative results of MRCP were associated with intraductal stones that did not fill the common bile duct during the 2-minute acquisition period, duodenal
